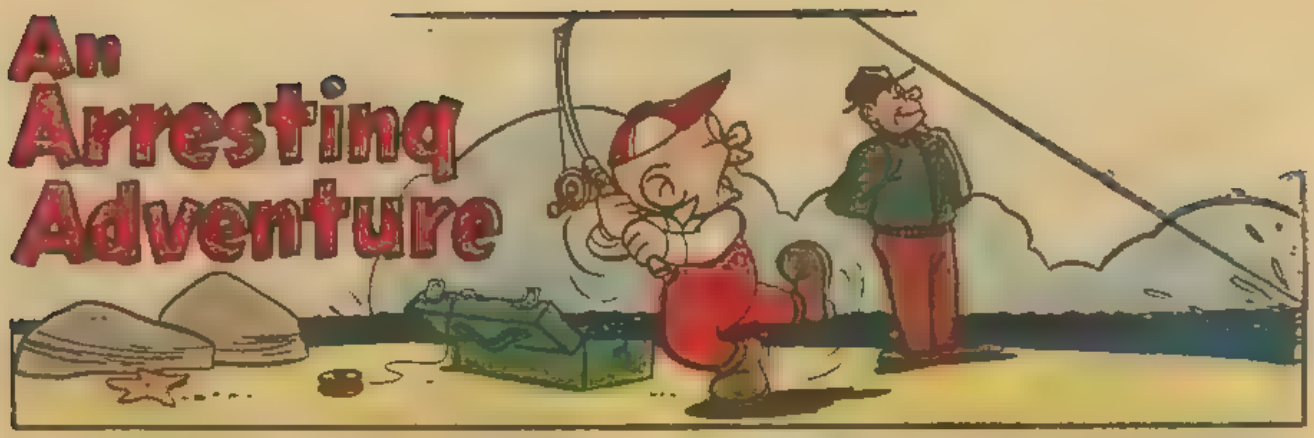
An Arresting Adventure



"Ho! Ho! This is the best idea I've ever had for keeping that wascally Daffy Duck from following me awound. He hates to fish." Elmer chuckled. "Buying all this fishing equipment was wather expensive, but it will be worth it just to know I can spend the day all by myself here on the beach."

Humming happily, Elmer started to put his rod together. "Let's see. The weel goes here. Now, I thwead the line through these little loops."

"Wait, Walton," a familiar voice advised from behind Elmer. "You have your reel upside down."

Elmer had been so intent on assembling his new rod and reel that he had not heard Daffy plodding through the soft sand.

"You!" he screeched. "You followed me, you dweadful cweature. You told me you hated fishing. What are you doing here?"

"Easy, Isaac! This is a public beach, remember?" Daffy replied. "Besides, there's no need to get upset. Does this look as if I'm going fishing?" he asked, slapping the side of a long surfboard he held under his arm. "I go in for active sports, Sport. Watch for me. I'll be in with the tide, Clyde," he called, running toward the water.

"Dwat that duck! He'll pwobably wuin the whole day," Elmer glowered as he baited his hook. He waded a short way into the water to cast his line, and watched as it sailed over the foam and dropped with a splash near Daffy's surfboard.

As Elmer turned to walk back and wait for a nibble, a stranger approached him. "Do much fishin'?" he asked.

"This is my first time," Elmer admitted. "It takes such a lot of patience."

He had no sooner uttered the words when his pole jerked frantically.

"Hooway! I've got a bite alweady, and it feels like a whopper!" Elmer cheered as he started reeling in his line.

"In that case, I'll have to see your fishing license," the stranger announced. "I'm the fish and game warden," he added, flashing his badge.

"But I don't have a fishing license!" Elmer wailed. "What will I do?"

Elmer kept reeling in his line anyhow, and before he realized it, he had landed his catch. But, instead of a fish, it was a wet, spluttering Daffy Duck.

"What kind of a fisherman are you, Fuddsy?" Daffy demanded. "You cast your line right on top of my surfboard and hooked me."

Elmer looked at the outraged Daffy for a minute, then burst out laughing.

"Lucky for me I did, too. I guess that lets me off the hook, Mr. Warden. I just happen to have a duck-hunting license," he said, pulling it from his wallet.

"Well, okay," the warden agreed, looking at it carefully. "As long as you didn't catch a fish, I guess I won't have to arrest you."

"Wait a minute, Warden!" Daffy squawked. "I'd call this a fish, wouldn't you?" he asked, pulling a large slippery fish out of his swimming trunks.

"Oh, no!" Elmer gasped when he saw it. "Don't awwest me, please!" he pleaded. Then a thought crossed his mind. "Awwest me! Awwest me! Take me with you, Mr. Warden," he shouted. "I'm weady and willing. In fact, I insist that you awwest me for bweaking the law!"

"But . . ." the puzzled warden muttered.

"That's the only sure-fire way I can keep that duck from following me," Elmer smiled.
